and—and still keep her courage and her faith.

She had reached the lower section of Sixth Avenue, Perimer's office was still a little farther on. Through a jeweller's window she noted the time. It was not quite 19 o'clock; and—yes, this was the place; here was Perimer's name among those on the name-plate at the street entrance of a small, three story building.

a small three-story building. She entered the hallway and found it descrited, and very poorly lighted. Perimer's room was No. 11, and on the

She mounted the stairs, moved quietly down the dim hallway, and stopped before the door of room No. 11. before the door of room No. 11.

She tried the door it was unlocke! She pushed it noiselessly open stepped inside, and closed it behind her. The round white ray of her fashlight went dancing inquisitively around the office in front of her. She stepped quickly around the flat-topped desk—and a low cry of dismay came from her. The lower drawer had been completely removed, and lay unturned beside the swivel chair, its upturned beside the swivel chair, it contents strewn around in all directions.

There was no need to search among

There was no need to search among those papers on the floor.

A little dazed, ever-wrought, she made her way out of the building, and to the street. And then suddenly she turned hurriedly into a cross street, and headed over toward the east side. She must find Nicky Viner himself and warn the man. It was but a little after 10 now—she had nearly a full two hours in which to accompash what should not take her more than a few minutes. few minutes. Five minutes, ter minutes passed

Five minutes, ten minutes passed; and, in a narrow street she halted, drawn back in the shadows of a doorway, and studied a tenement building that was just ahead of her. Not a light showed in the place from top to buttom. From its exterior it might have been uninhabited, even long descried. Seizing her opnortunity when for half a block or more the street was free of nedestrians, she stole forward and slipped quickly inside into the half, while har hand went to her pocket for the reassuring touch of her revolver.

Feeling out before her with her hands, she reached the stairs, and hands, she reached the states, and began to mount them. She dared not make any noise. Gaining the landing she halted, then was trying Neky Viner's door. It was unlocked, and as she opened it for the space of a crack there showed a tiny chink of light. She pushed the door open, then volver was thrust into the Adventurer, turer's face; and the Adventurer, caught at a disadvantage, since his hand in his coat pocket was below the intervening table top, stood there motionless.

And then again the gray beard and

And then again the gray beard and the gray hair, too, seemed to fall and flutter to the table, and the bent shoulders were not bent any more, and it wasn't Nicky Viner at all-only a clever, a wenderfully clever, impersonation. Those narrowed eyes, that leering, gloating face, those working lips were Danglar's.

"You'll take your hand out of that cost pocket now!" sneered Danglar.
"And take it out—empty!!"

The Adventurer obeyed with a shring of his shoulders.
